The Ledger's Leaflets—No. 34.

That the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 means silver monometallism, has been so often stated in speech and writing that this proposition has become thoroughly familiar to the people of the United States. Mr. Bryan, indeed, denies it, and reiterates that free coinage means a "return to bimetallism." The "Handbook of Money," however, circulated as a silver Democratic campaign document, contains an appendix entitled "A Silver Basis," in which the following distinct avowal occurs on page 291:

"To all informed people a silver basis means simply the business of the United States done with silver dollars, or their paper representatives, and a premium on gold for foreign usewhich would amount to a Tariff on imports from gold countries. If such an end could be reached—which is impossible—it would be the richest of blessings to the American people."

The author of this appendix goes on to explain how and why it would be a blessing. It would "release our gold from domestic use just so far as it could be done without the fall of prices below the European level. Every million or hundred millions of dollars so released would increase the money volume of Europe, and with it the returns for every one of our commodities sent to gold countries." He quotes with approval Judge Hillyer's pamphlet entitled "A Silver Basis," in which the United States is included in the list of Nations "using silver exclusively" if a free coinage act should be adopted.

It is true that he argues that this country cannot reach an exclusively silver basis. Why not? Because, as he asserts, "there can be no premium on gold under free coinage at 16 to 1." This is not only a pure assertion, unsupported by a scintilla of proof, but it is an assertion believed by the ablest financiers and economists to be contrary to the truth. The declaration that "the monetary demand upon" the two precious metals, "exceeding the supply, must necessarily hold them at a parity with each other," and the admission that there is no other reason for believing that both metals will continue to circulate here under a free coinage act, will be regarded by men who do not accept this declaration as true as a confession that silver monometallism is the ideal monetary system whose establishment is at heart desired by the logical and consistent friends of Bryan at the polls.
